Though August got off to a sweltering start, the temperature this past week has hovered in the low 70s, disappointing many tourists who have waited all summer for their week or two of seaside vacation.

"The weather is really awful here," said Marianne Loney of Harrisburg, Pa. as she sipped an Irish coffee in a Rehoboth bar Thursday night. The temperature outside was 50, and tourists hurried by, dressed in long pants and sweat shirts. Inside, it wasn't much warmer, and she cupped her glass with two hands for warmth.

"Usually I like to sit on the beach and swim all day. I really love the water. But this week you can just forget that. You come out of the water and you feel like a Popsicle. I've been doing a lot of reading—inside."

Mort Shapiro, a real estate agent from Baltimore, said he felt cheated.

"Here I am paying $900 a week for a deluxe, four-bedroom house on the beach, and the weather is lousy. I've been cold all week — do you know how lousy it is when you can't seem to warm up your hands and feet for a whole week?" he said.

Beach Fun Cooled by Unusual Weather

By Mike Sager
and Valerie Montague
Washington Post Staff Writers

Stanley Cooke lay beached on the sand in front of his $550-a-week ocean-sidecottage in Rehoboth Beach, Del., his face smeared with oil and his 270-pound frame wrapped in a heavy red quilt.

Although the temperature was nearly 70 at 11 a.m. yesterday, the 15-mph winds chilled the seaside air to a cool 60. But Cooke, a 35-year old appliance salesman who made reservations for his cottage last January, said he was determined to get a tan anyway.

"Back in June I thought we would never make it, with the gas crisis and all,' said Cooke. "But now, when there's gas, it's cold. It feels like October here."

Cooke drove from Hyattsville with his wife Becky and their two children last Saturday to begin their annual two-week vacation in an air-conditiond, two bedroom cottage. But like the thousands of other tourists in town this week, his hopes of long days of body-baking and nights of strolling the boardwalk have been frozen by unseasonably low temperatures.

According to the National Weather Service, the summer of '79 has been an unusually cool one. The average temperature in June was 72 degrees, compared to a 30-year average of 77. In July, the average was 76 normally, temperatures in that month average around 84.

Though August got off to a sweltering start, the temperature this past week has hovered in the low 70s, disappointing many tourists who have waited all summer for their week or two of seaside vacation.

"The weather is really awful here," said Marianne Loney of Harrisburg, Pa. as she sipped an Irish coffee in a Rehoboth bar Thursday night. The temperature outside was 50, and tourists hurried by, dressed in long pants and sweat shirts. Inside, it wasn't much warmer, and she cupped her glass with two hands for warmth.

"Usually I like to sit on the beach and swim all day. I really love the water. But this week you can just forget that. You come out of the water and you feel like a Popsicle. I've been doing a lot of reading—inside."

Mort Shapiro, a real estate agent from Baltimore, said he felt cheated.

"Here I am paying $900 a week for a deluxe, four-bedroom house on the beach, and the weather is lousy. I've been cold all week — do you know how lousy it is when you can't seem to warm up your hands and feet for a whole week?" he said.
